RICHARD FRANKLIN RECALLS UNIT 26

Back together again, for the first time on stage! The United Nations Intelligence Taskforce are in action once more in Recall UNIT: The Great T-Bag Mystery. The play, written and directed by Richard Franklin (see interview on page 35), was performed at the Edinburgh Festival this year. Recall UNIT stars old Doctor Who favourites Franklin (Captain Yates) and John Levene (Sergeant Benton) and also features Nicholas Courtney as the Voice of the Brigadier. Doctor Who Magazine presents an in-depth feature on the production of the play.

FROM THE ARCHIVES 15

This month we enter The Caves of Androzani, the popular story from last season, which featured the last appearance of Peter Davison as the fifth incarnation of the Doctor.

DOCTOR WHO INTERVIEWS 20 & 35

Doctor Who Magazine talks to Terrance Dicks, popular Doctor Who script writer and author of many Target novelisations, about his long involvement with the show. We also present an interview with Richard Franklin (alias Captain Mike Yates of UNIT) who discusses his time on Doctor Who and his work as director/writer/actor of Recall UNIT: The Great T-Bag Mystery (see page 26).

COMIC STRIP 7

Starting this issue, a brand new comic strip adventure. The story features the return (by popular demand) of the amazing Dr Asimoff, famous science fiction author and champion of endangered wildlife. In this latest adventure, written by Steve Parkhouse and drawn by John Ridgway, Asimoff is campaigning to save a rare galactic species hunted mercilessly for the valuable raw materials their bodies provide. On his way to a vital conference of the "Save the Zyglot" campaign Asimoff runs into the Doctor and his penguin companion Frobisher.

SATISFIED READER

I just had to write to you after issue 93, I just can't contain my excitement for your updated, more colourful Doctor Who Magazine.

It's just gone from strength to strength recently, not just because of the extra colour pages – the whole thing is so fresh and alive, with great articles and some fantastic photos and interviews. Tom Baker was excellent in 92 and 93's interview with Ian Marter was also terrific.

The comic strip has also stayed at the high level when Mick Austin was on the strip-some of his best work ever I thought – the character and appearance of the 6th doctor are very well done, considering the artist only has a limited amount of screen appearances from Colin Baker to work from – lovely stuff, keep it up.

The poster in 93 was excellent, as was the cover, I for one wouldn't mind seeing the Zygon's make a return visit to Doctor Who during Colin Baker's era. To me they are one of the less obvious 'Actor in a suit trying to look alien' type of Who monster.

I was surprised that Resurrection of the Daleks came top in your Season Survey. For me there was only one really excellent tale from season 21 and that was Caves of Androzani – if only they hadn't had the pathetic Magma creature lurking around.

Before I close this letter I'd like to offer my congratulations on, firstly, 5 years of the Marvel Doctor Who comic/magazine as of 17th October, 1984 and also on the remarkable fact that you have now published 50 Monthly issues of the world's greatest TV Stars magazine – like I said at the beginning of this note, the way things are going with this mag, the next 5 years are sure worth waiting for. Keep up the ace work – nobody does it better...

Richard Thomas,
Adlington,
Cheshire.

MASTER OF THE HOUSE

On watching a recently repeated episode of Upstairs, Downstairs I was surprised and delighted by the inclusion of Antony Ainley in the cast, portraying an up and coming politician, Lord Charles Gilmore who had become involved in a local scandal involving a colleague's wife. During the last scene he appeared (before walking away into the proverbial sunset) I must admit to have been rather taken aback when Mr Ainley delivered the line, "Remember this, I shall always be my own master..." Spooky eh? Considering the fact that it was made around 10 years ago!

Nicholas Randell,
East Harling,
Norfolk.

MASTER DOCTOR

I have read with interest the letters, and listened eagerly, to the conversations, between fellow 'Who-vians' about the possible family relationship of the Doctor and the Master. More often than not the conversations are to whether the Master is the Doctor's brother or not. I say that he is not, I say that he is his son. To the casual reader that statement may seem rather rash, and, yes, it is based mainly on shakey sources, but, nevertheless, it is my theory. I will explain...

I first began to form this theory when I heard of William Hartnell's suggestion in the early days of the programme, to have a spin off called Son of Doctor Who which would feature the evil son of the Doctor, who would travel in time and space doing evil instead of good. Sounds rather like the Master doesn't it? OK, I thought, coincidence. I then read Tomb of the Cybermen by Gerry Davis. I found on page 112, a statement by the Doctor that got me thinking. Victoria questions the Doctor about his family. The Doctor replies: "I have to really want to bring them back in front of my eyes – the rest of the time they sleep in my mind and I forget."

Why would he have obviously painful feelings, unless one of them had been a 'black sheep'? Why his son? Because it accounts for the Susan mystery.

Recently, in Planet of Fire, the Master's final call of "Won't you even show mercy on your own..." cleared the point forever in my mind. I would like to know what other fans think.

THE SCISSORTATION

The video of the Brain of Morbius has been attacked by the Doctor's greatest enemy, who we last saw in the Genescissors of the Daleks. Do we mean the Daleks? Or Davros? No, we mean that plague that has the effect on a story of warping approximately two episodes into the mysterious Time Vortex known only as the BBC dustbin. Yes the Scissors ARE BACK!

Once again we hear that terrifying cry of "DE-GEN-ER-ATE".

Will the Doctor be able to track down the Scissors before they strike again? Or will the Doctor be captured by his foe and then meet a fate worse than death-to be erased from the tape!

What is the Scissors next aim? The Scissorites? The Massascissors? The Ambascissors of Death? Or even The Lescissor Hive?

Tune in next week for another thrilling episode – unless the Scissors get there first!

Alasdair Non.

Cutting words indeed, Alasdair.

HOLIDAY OF THE DALEKS

Here is a photo of a Dalek Ride on the Colwyn Bay Pier in Wales. You put 10p in the slot, sit inside the Dalek and then the whole machine spins round, with the lights flashing. So now you know what is inside a Dalek!

Ray Brooking,

Avon.

We believe your picture illustrates the sporty open-sided Dalek model. Its occupant was probably on holiday in Colwyn Bay at the time, and we would imagine it was just renting its shell out at 10p a ride to make some extra summer pocket money.

KATY'S NEW CEREAL

I would just like to say that ever since I bought issue no 83 your magazine has just kept on improving. The interviews are terrific and so are the On Target book reviews. Believe it or not Katy Manning has done an advertisement for Cornflakes which is being shown in Australia. Could you do an Archives on either of the Auton stories and keep the good work up.

Stephen Walker,
Kelmscott,
Western Australia.

There is an Archives feature on Terror of the Autons in this year's Doctor Who Winter Special (on sale from 22nd November, 1984).

THE MASTER REVEALED!

The answer to the anagram in issue 93 is in fact THE TIMELORD ON SARN, which of course refers to the Master in the Planet of Fire story. As most people will know, the hint of "James Stoker" is itself an anagram of "Master's Joke".

Paddy Seward,
Cleethorpes,
South Humberside.

Well done, Paddy! You were the first reader to write in with the answer to "Mr Stoker's" anagram. If you let us know your full address we will send you one of our special Doctor Who Magazine prizes for your efforts.

MORE MINIATURES

Further to our report a couple of months ago the latest in the series of metal figurines from Fine Art Castings is a Dalek, which is out now.

The company are also considering producing a range of models at 40mm high and a series of pewter busts of each of the Doctors at 45mm. The whole project seems to be taking shape very well and looks as if it will be around for a very long time.

CONVENTION NEWS

Two Doctor Who conventions are due to be held in different parts of England later this year.

November 10th sees a joint effort by the Merseyside Local Group of Doctor Who fans and the Merseyside Science Fiction Media Group to produce a convention to celebrate the show's 21st birthday. There will be guest panels, costume and model displays, forums, a raffle in aid of charity and a buffet and disco. For more details write to Graeme Wood, one of the organisers, at 48, Western Avenue, Speke, Liverpool L24 3UR. In another part of the country on December 9th a similar convention will be held in Southampton. For details of that event write to William Baggs, 3 Douglas Crescent, Bitterne, Southampton, Hampshire.

TWO DOCTORS UPDATE

Director Peter Moffatt, his cast and crew have now returned from Spain where filming took place in temperatures of over 100 degrees, in and around the town of Seville. Peter says he is delighted with the film rushes and says the three studio recording sessions will be completed by the end of September. So, as you're reading this sometime in early November, work should be complete — barring any unforseen circumstances, of course.

TARGET NEWS

The Twin Dilemma* by Eric Saward has been temporarily shelved from W H Allen's provisional list for early next year and in its place January will see the publication in hardback, for the first time, of The Abominable Snowmen and The Crusaders.

The latter has been published in hard cover by another publisher. In paperback will be Frontios. February has The Awakening (Pringle) in hardback and Planet of Fire (Grimwade) in paperback. March has The Mind of Evil (Dicks) in hard cover and Caves of Androzani (Dicks) in soft. In hardback in April is The Invasion (Marter) and the paperback is Marco Polo (Lucarroti), then in May we get The Myth Makers (Cotton) in hardback and, at long last, a paperback reprint of The Doctor Who Monster Book. Finally, June's hardback is The Krotons (Dicks) and in paperback The Awakening (Pringle). Thanks as always to Christine Donougher for her help and assistance, in compiling this list.

QUOTE OF THE MONTH

This month's comes from Anthony Ruane of Harwich in Essex. It goes as follows: "Well of course I'm alright. But suppose I wasn't alright?' This thing makes me feel in such a way that I'd be very worried if I felt like that about somebody else feeling like this about that. Do you understand?" Last month's quote came from Destiny of the Daleks, spoken by the Doctor (Tom Baker).

FIGURINES

Many readers have written in requesting more details of how to obtain the Doctor Who figurines mentioned in issue 93.

We would like to point out that the models of the Master, made by Susan Moore, are not on the market just yet, but should be available very soon.

PRODUCTION NEWS

With filming now complete on Attack of the Cybermen, Vengeance on Varos and The Two Doctors, the production team went off on holiday for a couple of weeks.

As you read this, work ought to have started on Mark of The Rani, directed by Sarah Hellings and written by Pip and Jane Baker. This story will be transmitted third next year, having swapped with the three part Two Doctors which will now go out fourth. The guest cast includes Anthony Ainley as The Master and Kate O'Hara as the Rani. A substantial amount of the story will be shot on film, not in the studio. Story five, directed by old-hand Pennant Roberts starts pre-production later this month and is written by another newcomer to Doctor Who, Glen McCoy who has penned a story in two parts with the intriguing title of Timelash.

COLONIAL COMEBACK

The good news is that six episodes of early Doctor Who have been returned to the archives at the BBC and are now in the capable hands of BBC man-at-the-top Steve Bryant. The episodes concerned are three from the William Hartnell era: episodes 1,3 and 4 of The Time Meddler and 1,2 and 4 of The War Machines. Now, if you take a look back at our list of the archives from our 1981 Winter Special (if you're lucky enough to possess one) you will see that the BBC already have in their vaults the respective second episodes which now means that they have another two complete stories! The episodes have been returned, would you belive, from Nigeria, after four months of extensive research by fan Ian Levene, with help from the authorities of Nigerian State Television Service.

KENILWORTH REPORT

Thanks to readers Stephen Payne and John Ainsworth for the following information about the Kenilworth Doctor Who event this past August Bank Holiday. Throughout the three days the weather was perfect, and thousands of fans flocked to see some of the show's stars who were slated to appear at the Town and Country Festival. Sadly not all of them could make it, but those who did obviously enjoyed themselves. On Saturday the 25th current Doctor Colin Baker was present along with the lovely Elisabeth Sladen who was the recipient of a beautiful photograph of herself, specially framed and tinted which the work of a young fan whom Lis then proceeded to wave at every time she spotted him amongst the crowds. On Sunday Colin returned — surrounded by cat badges — and was joined by the popular Janet Fielding, whilst on Monday it was the turn of ex-Doctor Jon Pertwee and series producer John Nathan-Turner. A white jeep ferried the stars around the ground as they talked to fans, signed autographs and posed for photographs, and a Doctor Who tent sold merchandising to the eager crowds. The Whomobile put in a guest appearance too and on all three days a fancy dress competition was held with the judges being the visiting stars. All in all, a great success.

MATRIX
Databank

Thank you to everyone who wrote in with the solution as to why the first Doctor knew that the fifth was the ashes' reincarnation in The Five Doctors. It was of course because the Davison incarnation was in the TARDIS while the other four had been scooped up by Borusa.

TITLE, TITLE

A question now from Simon Robinson who asks about changing title sequences and the stories when a new sequence was first used. Obviously the first sequence started with the very first episode An Unearthly Child and went right through to The Macra Terror. Appropriately enough The Faceless Ones saw the new sequence featuring, for the first time the Doctor's face, this being Patrick Troughton. When Jon Pertwee started the famous colourful swirls made their debut in Spearhead From Space and lasted through until The Green Death. The Time Warrior saw the use of the slit scan sequence with its "plane" effect now seen on the opening credits to Top of the Pops. The TARDIS and Tom Baker's face were incorporated into this at the start of Robot. Six years later The Leisure Hive saw the advent of the star field sequence which was then adapted in Castrovalva to feature the new Doctor, Peter Davison, complete with venetian blind effect in The Twin Dilemma. We saw a similar version for Colin Baker.

LOST COMPANIONS

Peter Ellerbrock of Yorkshire asks how many of the Doctor's companions have died as a result of their association with the Doctor. In Earthshock Adric was blown to pieces in the freighter which the Cybermen had forced to crash into our planet. Sarah Kingdom was killed along with the Dalek fleet at the end of The Daleks' Master Plan when the Time Destructor was operated, accelerating the aging process. And finally Katarina the Trojan hand-maiden died in the same story as she ejected herself and the criminal psychopath, Kirksen, from the air-lock of Mavic Chen's ship in an effort to allow the Doctor to proceed to Earth to stop the Daleks rather than return to Kembel.

SHADA KNOWN IT

Simple one now from Andrew Dodds of Ipswich who wants to know why Shada was never screened. This was because of one of a BBC strike that meant the story was scrapped halfway through. A shame as our archives in issue 81 showed it would have been an interesting story.

KEY QUESTION

Over to America now, from Brooklyn in New York where David Rudin has sent in a query concerning the Key To Time season. At the start, says David, the White Guardian sent the Doctor and Romana on a mission to retrieve the keys so that he could assemble them to restore harmony and avert chaos. However, at the end of The Armageddon Factor the key pieces are collected together by the Doctor and then scattered to prevent the Black Guardian having them. What then, asks David, was the point in his assembling the White Guardian still hasn't restored harmony?

Tom Baker as the Doctor, Iain Cuthbertson as Garron and Mary Tamm as Romanain The Ribos Operation.

At the start of The Ribos Operation when the Doctor is assigned the White Guardian suggests that the Key needs to be complete only for a few seconds so he can stop time and destroy chaos. The Key is certainly together for a few seconds and if time was stopped and then started again, the Doctor wouldn't actually know. And the Guardian did not say he actually needed the Key in his possession to do this, it just had to be complete, a fact that betrays the Black Guardian when he insists on the Key being handed over to him.

DOCTOR BLAKE

Jeremy P Clark of Cleethorpes asks if any other leading Blake's 7 actors have appeared in Doctor Who other than Paul Darrow (Avon in Doctor Who and the Silurians as Captain Hawkins). Indeed Michael Keating (Vila) appeared in The Sunmakers as Goudry. Peter Tuddenham (Zen/Orac/Slave) was heard in Ark in Space in 1975 and a year later as the Mandragora voice in Masque of Mandragora. Brian Croucher (Travis) was Borg in The Robots of Death and Jacqueline Pearce (Servalan) features in The Two Doctors next year as Chessene. To date Gareth Thomas, Sally Knyvette, David Jackson, Stephen Greif, Stephen Pacey, Josette Simon and Glynis Barber have yet to appear in Doctor Who.

QUICK QUERY

Stuart Humphries, of Thornton Heath in Surrey, asks what planet the Sontarans returning to the programme next year originate from. Sontar is the answer to that one.

SONIC SCREWDRIVER

A couple of questions now from David Shrimpton of Reigate. If the Doctor invented the sonic screwdriver in Fury From The Deep why did Rodan ask for one in Invasion of Time, and then why if according to the Time Lord in Genesis of the Daleks the race had long since abandoned transmats, did they use one in The Five Doctors? Firstly, the Doctor didn't invent the sonic screwdriver but built it, presumably it's a tool that Galifrey uses as the time remember Romana built one as well as seen in The Horns of Nimon. And what the Time Lord says in Genesis is that her race learnt how to intercept transmat beams eons ago because the Doctor complains that such things are dangerous.

BY ANY OTHER NAME

Many people have asked for a list of stories working titles (titles that the stories had whilst being made but changed for transmission. This is tricky because some titles are known as original titles used by the writer but changed before work was started by the BBC. Perhaps the best term to use for these would be provisional titles. Examples of these are The Wasting which became State of Decay for transmission, whereas Full Circle was made under that title but written by Andrew Smith as The Planet That Slept. The Tribe of Gum was always had but The Daleks was originally The Mutants, Edge of Destruction was once known as Inside The Spaceship and Marco Polo as A Trip To Cathay. The Patrick Troughton story Fury From The Deep was originally called Colony of Devils and The Invasion was once called Return of the Cybermen. Ambassadors of Death was called Invaders From Mars and Mind Of Evil was called The Pandora's Box. The Claws of Axos was also known as Vampires From Space and The Curse of Peladon was originally just The Curse. Carnival of Monsters used to be called Peepshow and Planet of the Daleks was called Destination Daleks. Death to the Daleks was called The Exxilons and The Sontaran Experiment was originally The Destructors. The Masque of Mandragora was once The Curse of Mandragora and The Face Of Evil was called The Day God Went Mad. The Talons of Weng Chiang was once called The Talons of Greed and The Invisible Enemy was first called The Enemy Within. City of Death in its original form, was called A Gamble With Time and Megios was The Last Zolpha-Thuran. Full Circle and State of Decay I've already mentioned and that almost brings us up to date with Earthshock being called Sentinel, Time-Flight being Xeraphin and Enlightenment being The Enlighters. Perhaps at a later date we'll have a go at listing some of the stories that either never made the screen such as The Robots and Sealed Orders and some that changed rather dramatically like The Space Trap, better known now as The Krotons.

Keep your postcards coming in and if anyone can add further titles to the above list, we'd be more than happy to print them. ■

Three non-fiction books to look at this month. Firstly, the big expensive follow up to Peter Haining's phenomenally successful Doctor Who. A Celebration from last year. One of W H Allen's top-selling books of all time Doctor Who The Key To Time was a well documented history of the series through key dates during that period. Going, year by year, Pete Haining cleverly records every important development, press reaction and personnel change there has been. Obviously not every mention in the national press is here – you would need about ten volumes to do that – but most items of interest are here – and on the fly pages there are reproductions of some of those press pieces, including the departure of Tom Baker, the death of Roger Delgado, the theft of two Daleks en route to Wales and Jean Rook's famous Daily Express interview with Robert Holmes. Following those pages is an introduction by Haining himself preceeded by attractive piece of artwork by the ubiquitous Mark Bentham. Enhanced by both colour and black and white photographs, this book is an excellent reference item. I feel that he really takes a little too much of the credit when it would seem that Doctor Who Magazine writer Jeremy Bentham has supplied a majority of the background information, especially for the first three Doctors eras. There are mistakes in the book – small things like the BBC's Engineering Training Centre at Evesham, used for Spearhead From Space, Invasion and Robot being called Davesham (the fictional place in The Android Invasion, also filmed near Evesham), and the statement that Peter Davison is the only actor so far to have been featured on This is Your Life whilst playing the Doctor, while Jon Pertwee also appeared while making The Mutants. Overall though, Peter Haining looks as if he's another winner on his hands.

May sees the reprinting (at last) of the original Doctor Who Monster Book by Terrance Dicks that chronicles various monsters and villians, from the Daleks and Cybermen up to The Wirrn and The Zygons – the most recent creatures when the book was first published. Terrance wrote the short features on each monster or race of aliens and Cashing in on the success of Nigel Robinson's Crossword and Quiz Books comes Adrian Heath's puzzle and game book – with quizzes, word searches, anagrams etc. Ideal Christmas fare although a repetition of the Robinson format is a little tedious. Essentially there is nothing wrong with the book and by no means are all the questions simple, but it is certainly important to have a complete set of Target's novelisations handy as many of the answers are only to be found in those. With two quiz books, a crossword book and now a puzzle book, one wonders what W H Allen will give us next Christmas.

Next month it's back to the world of the novelisations, with a look at Ian Marter's Invasion and Terrance Dicks' Mind of Evil. Just a reminder that this month sees the publication of Caves of Androzani in hardback and The Highlanders in paperback.

CAVES OF ANDROZANI

EPISODE ONE

The Doctor with new companion Peri lands the TARDIS on the sand-covered planet of Androzani Minor, sister plane to the heavily colonised Androzani Major. Amongst the mud the travellers discover lumps of silicate from a spacecraft and evidence that a small vehicle has visited recently with a heavy load. They also discover a range of blow-holes, outlets for the volcanic mud-bursts that erupt whenever the planet orbits closely to its sister. They head towards the cave-like holes.

Down in the tunnels leading from the caves a group of soldiers are surveying the area. One of them is suddenly attacked and killed by a ferocious Magma Beast – a carnivorous creature that lives deep inside the cave system.

As the Doctor examines the cave walls, Peri slips down a small ravine, landing on a soft, sticky ball of web-like substance. She wipes the stuff from her legs, hoping that it is harmless.

Not far away a group of gunrunners wait for a pick up of their latest consignment. They hide as the Doctor and Peri wander towards them, but are relieved when the two newcomers are arrested by a group of soldiers.

At the Army HQ General Chellack is receiving a report from his Major Salateen, who explains that Captain Bones has captured some gunrunners in the tunnels. Chellak is delighted.

Top: Military men on the barren planet surface of Androzani Minor. Above: Sharaz Jek (Christopher Gable) with the Doctor (Peter Davison).

In a plush penthouse office on Major sits Trau Morgus, Chairman of the Sirius Conglomerate, checking the output of some of his concerns with his aide, Krau Timmin. Timmin reports that Chellak has captured two gunrunners. Morgus tells her to get Chellak on the video link.

Chellak is annoyed at the news that the Magma Beast has again killed a soldier. The Doctor and Peri arrive and tell him they are innocent. Their talk is interrupted by the call of Morgus on video.

Morgus is giving orders to a darkly-clad shadowy figure who hurries off as Chellak's face appears as a hologram.

Deep beneath the caves in his own hideaway Sharaz Jek listens to their conversation. He also has ▶ a screen on which he can see the Doctor and Per who have now been put on the hologram for Morgus to speak to.

Morgus tells the Doctor he despises gunrunners and dismisses him. Chellak's face returns to Morgus insists that the two travellers be executed.

Stotz, leader of the gunrunners, Kreipe, his number two, and another three other men open fire on Bones' soldiers.

No amount of reasoning by the Doctor can convince Chellak to release them. Chellak goes to find out what has happened to Bones and his troopers.

Stotz decides that with the soldiers no longer aware of their existence they must dump the weapons. They do this as Chellak and his troops arrive.

In their cell the Doctor and Per meet the two whom Per was with presumably as a result of the sticky sunstone. Per and Doctor discuss their predicament unknowingly they are watched by Sharaz Jek on his video screens. His hands flicker across various controls as he watches up in the cell the travellers observe their place of execution being prepared. Both turn to see the wall behind them slide open.

Morgus discusses with the President of Androzani Minor the advantages of Spectrox, a drug that can prolong life twice the normal span. The expensive war with Sharaz Jek is also on the agenda and Morgus is determined that the Praesidium are considering negotiations with the renegade. The main reason for that the executions is about to occur.

On Main the President and Trau Morgus watch as the Doctor and Per are led to the rocks and fired from the cells. The firing squad's guns are riddled with bullets.

EPISODE TWO

The Doctor and Per are safely in Jek's laboratory. The masked man takes more than a passing interest in them.

Chellak, Major Sarad and Ensign Cass discover that they have executed androids and orders a search to be made. Jek, a ghoulish Sateen's discovery is assisted by the sluggish Stotz by sending him on a mission that few return from.

Jek interrogates the Doctor and Per finding them interesting, especially Per whose beauty he is keen to acknowledge. He usually informs them they are to be his companions for the rest of their lives.

Stotz and his men are on the surface testing Kreiper's allegiance. Stotz's leadership. To assert himself Stotz suddenly assaults Kreipe with a knife and whilst the others watch stabs the screaming gunrunner to the cliff edge where he forces him to swallow an apparently poisoned pill. Eventually once assured of Kreiper's continued subservience he releases him and leaves off again.

Jek explains to the Doctor and Per about Spectrox and the war which he appears to be winning. Eventually he plans to be the People's Leader when he can wreak his revenge on the man he hates so much, Morgus.

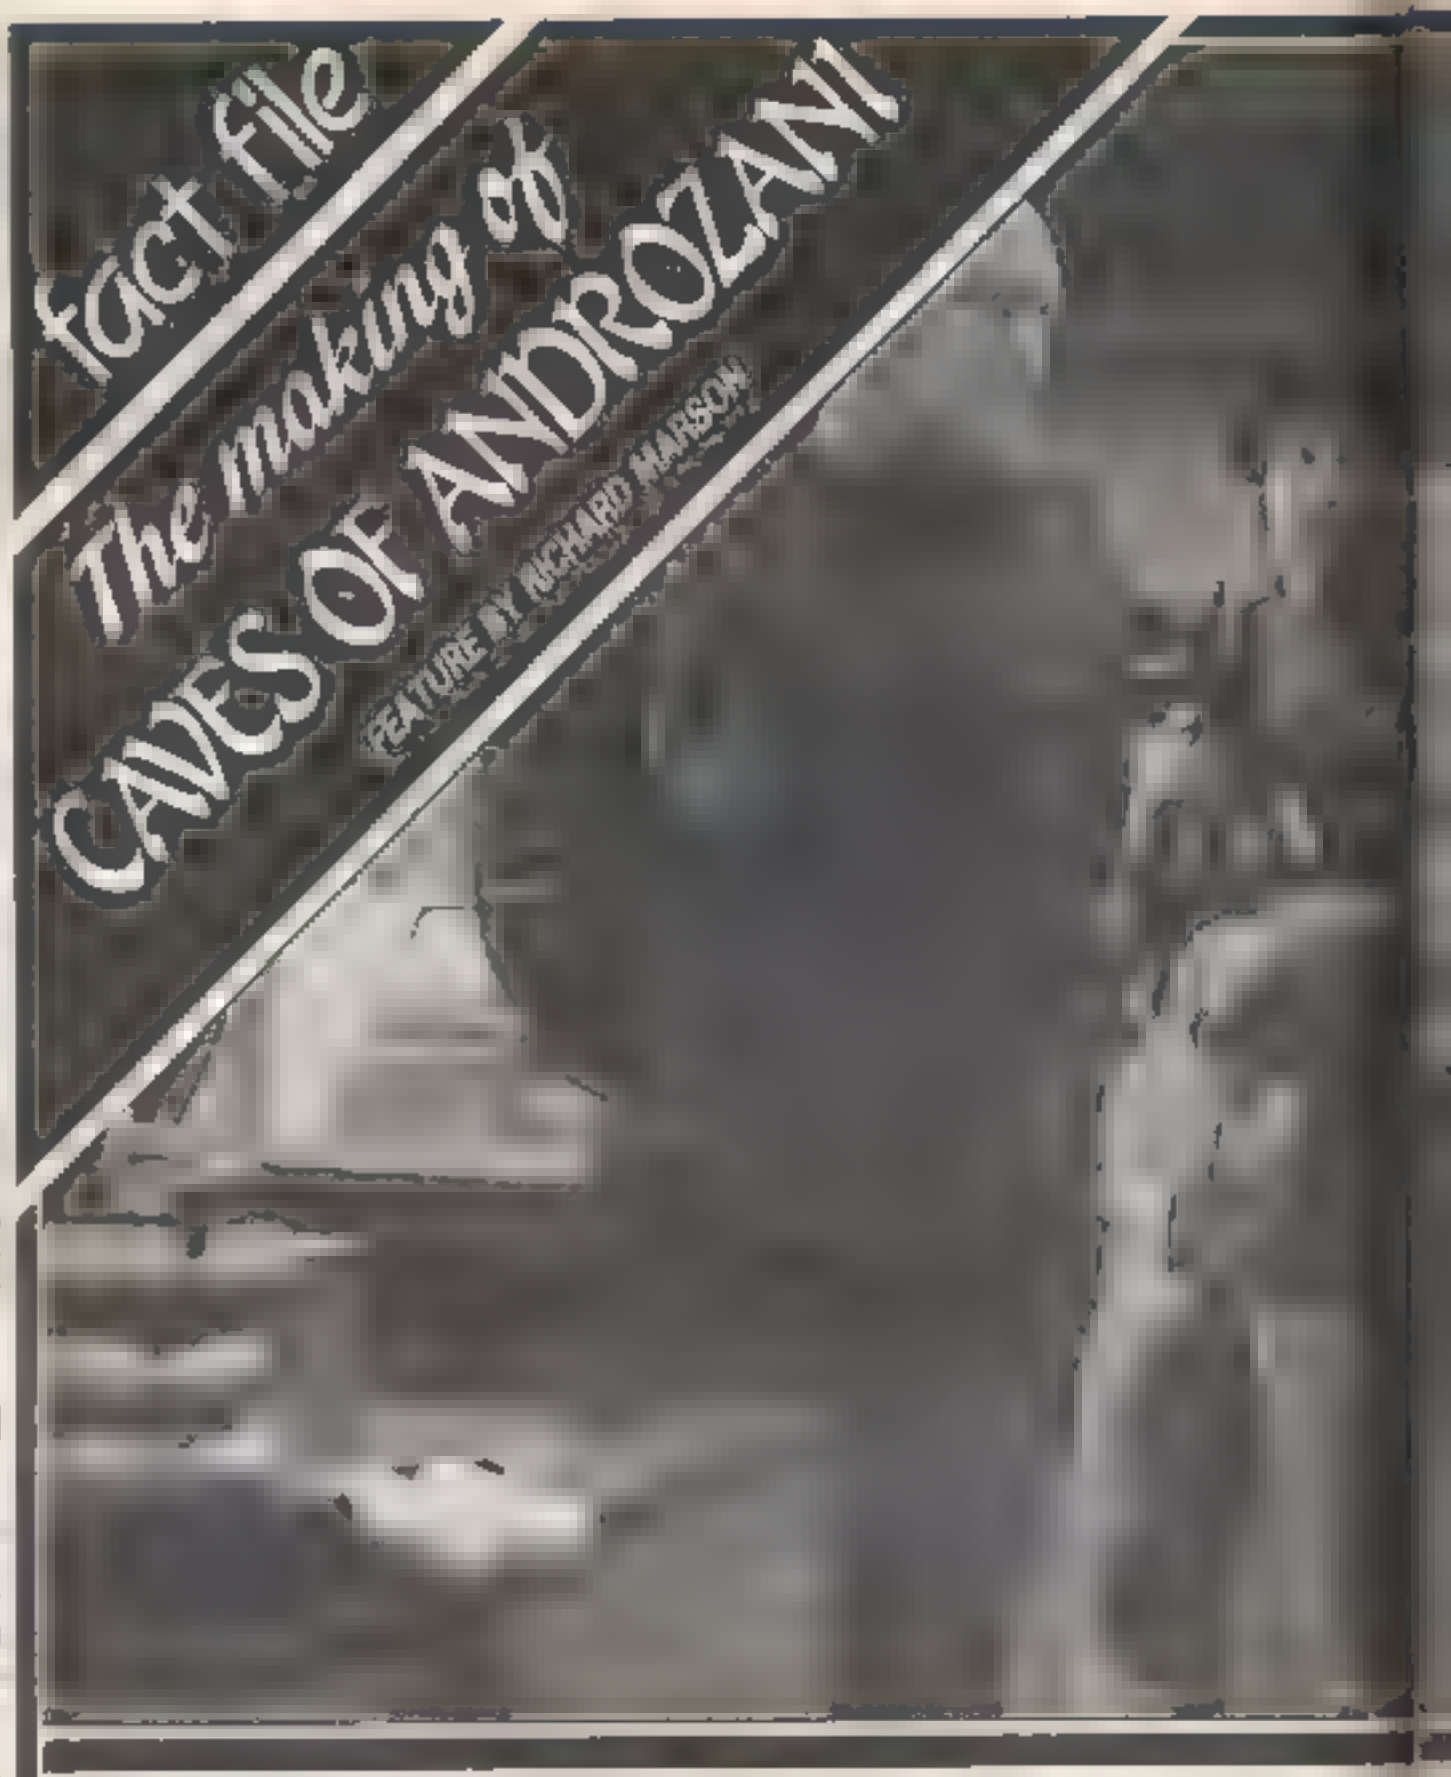
The Doctor and Per meet Salateen who is less than pleased to meet them as it means he is now indispensible to Jek and will be killed. His dismay becomes joy however when he realises that the two travellers are suffering from Spectrox toxaemia a potentially lethal disease to which the only cure was discovered by a Professor Jack. The milk of the hibernating Queen Bat is the cure but they live in the airless areas deep in the jewels of the plant along with the Magma Beast.

Jek and Stotz agree to meet and discuss the lost arms deal in the jewels.

The Doctor's plan to escape is countered by Salateen who explains that unless humans wear especially modified belt plates, Jek's android guards will gun them down without pausing. At that moment Jek returns.

In Chellak's office, Jek's android is informing the General that a mud burst is due although ever efficient he has taken the necessary precautions.

Jek informs the Doctor and Per that he and Morgus were once business partners but then the politician betrayed him and left him trapped in the slow of a mud burst. Horribly burned he struggled to survive waiting for the day to kill his enemy. After the scientist leaves the Doctor goes out and manages to sabotage the android guard. Finding a couple of belt plates and a gun for Salateen the



The Caves of Androzani started life as a story about gunrunning and expanded to include the Davison/Baker regeneration being broadcast as the penultimate story of the twenty-first season. The director was a newcomer to the show Graeme Harper and it was he who was responsible for its unique powerful atmosphere.

Location filming was at the famous BBC sandpit in Devon near Wareham and the crew were based there for three days shooting from November 15th to 17th. For the scene where the Doctor was seen to slide down a perilous ravine stunt double Gareth Milne was called in to obtain the potentially damage-ous shot. The explosions generated on location were also slowed down electronically because they would have been over too quickly had they been left as filmed. Graeme Harper explains how the dematerialisation of the TARDIS amid the explosions was achieved. "We locked off the camera on the area where we wanted the TARDIS to be running the film for about twenty seconds with and without the Police Box and with and without light or without moving the camera. We introduced the explosions and later electronically mixed the shots, slowing them down for maximum impact.

Challak talks with the android. It however has observed the other two with infra-red vision and plays along with Challak reiterating his warning about the mud-burst and then departing. Challak decides it's time to attack Jek's stronghold, and Per can lead the way.

On the way to Stotz's ship the Doctor feels the effect of Spectrax Toxaemia getting worse.

Saiateen and Challak plot to feed the rebels false information about the forthcoming attack. They are now confident of victory.

On Stotz's ship the Doctor is handcuffed to part of a wall in the control room. Stotz, on the Jek's behalf, after blindfolding the Time Lord, Stotz calls up his boss — none other than Morgus. He is surprised at seeing the Doctor present. Morgus incorrectly deduces that the execution was rigged by the President. He orders Stotz to stay in orbit around Mino.

Challak examines Per's battle plans, realising his men need them to fight. The android arrives and is despatched with a patrol to attack a transmitter Challak claims to have located.

Assuming that Jek will be monitoring all communications Challak calls up Morgus and says they are attacking Jek's headquarters. Horribly Morgus thanks Challak saying that he will inform the President immediately.

The Doctor manages to free himself and, after picking the control room entry door, takes the ship out of orbit.

Per, lying dazed at the HQ, is suddenly kidnapped by Jek.

In his penthouse Morgus tells the President that assassins are going to make attempts on his life. Morgus allows the President to save it via his personal elevator. As the President gingerly steps in he falls head-first down a deep chute, the elevator has gone. Somewhat unconcerned Morgus in forms Tremain that he will have to go on a peace mission on Mino. He also informs him that the fifth maintenance engineer is to be shot.

Jek enters his abode only with Per and an android. After Per reveals that Challak's army are on their way, Jek says that he has altered the android's receptors making their plates useless.

Stotz and Kreiper try to break into the control room and even briefly burn their way through but the Doctor has seemingly bashed and bashed, finding that he's sound within from the disease anyway. The ship hits Mino.

EPISODE FOUR

The Doctor escapes through the hatch at the back of the control room, hotly pursued by Kreiper and the other gunrunner.

Morgus contacts Stotz and is angry that he left orbit. He then says he is on his way to Androzani Minor himself.

Challak, Saiateen and the soldiers are advancing when they come across some androids. Saiateen strides forward confidently, claiming that no one will get hurt as they are wearing their plates. Consequently the androids blast him down and a full-scale battle commences.

The chase for the Doctor ceases as the mud-burst starts, cutting the hunted off from the hunters.

Although his forces are depleted, the General's men appear to be winning, and alone he surges forward, ignoring the warnings from his men about the mud-burst.

As the Doctor staggers through the tunnels, Jek leaves his bedroom and sees Challak who gives chase. The Doctor is fast and narrowly avoids being swept away by the gel, but Jek, thinking that pours through Kreiper returns to the ship and is surprised to see Morgus. He and his associate are dismissed and Morgus and Stotz discuss stealing back the Spectrox.

Challak corners Jek inside the laboratory and, during the ensuing fight, the General dislodges the mask, getting a glimpse of Jek's pale face, he screams and staggers back. Jek thrusts him outside the door and secures it. Too late Challak realises he is in the path of the mud and his cries are swamped as the searing lava buries him.

Morgus, like the gunrunners, is now an outlaw. With Stotz he leaves to find Jek, but Kreiper and the other mercenaries remain in the ship. Seconds after leaving Stotz dashes back and, with a manic grin, he guns his partners down.

The Doctor finds signs of the battle and, armed only with his grenades, Nuff too far away, Stotz and Morgus now equipped, head for Jek's laboratory. Giving the Doctor and oxygen cylinder, Jek allows the Time Lord to enjoy and locate the Queen Bat's milk.

As the two outlaws near the lab the Doctor discovers the trapped Magma Beast. Eventually he gets to the Bat's nest and extracts the milk. Now feeling very weak, he drags himself back towards the laboratory.

Jek is interrupted by Stotz and Morgus. Ripping away his mask, he lunges at the portrait. Calmly Stotz picks up his gun and with a psychotic smile pumps a bullet into Jek's back.

Behind Stotz the wall slides open and an android quietly arrives and raises its gun. Stotz's grin turns to a look of shock as he topples dead to the floor.

Jek finally shoves Morgus into some machinery which explodes, killing him.

As the flames engulf the lab, Jek keels over into the arms of the loyal android. The Doctor staggers in and scoops up Per before the laboratory turns into a fiery inferno.

Dashing across the planet's surface, the Doctor shoves Per into the TARDIS which dematerialises just as the mud exploded through the blow holes. Inside the ship he tips the bat milk down Per's throat and falls back. Jack's cure is almost instantaneous and quickly Per is at his side as his mind starts to wander and he sees faces from the past. Finally he sees the face of his arch enemy the Master. He sits up and the dreamscape seems to explode into noise and colour, and the Doctor is shaken by the TARDIS — literally a new man.

TERRANCE DICKS

by Randy and Jean-Marc Lofficier

Few names are as firmly associated with Doctor Who as that of Terrance Dicks. In 1968 Dicks joined the programme during Patrick Troughton's first season as the Doctor. He and producer Barry Letts were the primary forces responsible for the Third Doctor's Jon Pertwee eventful career on Earth and in Space. Both men were also involved in the casting of Tom Baker as the Fourth Doctor.

Dicks' contributions to the show include such mainstays as the Time Lords' first appearance in The War Games, the development of Sgt. Benton, the reappearance of that arch-villain, the Master, and the meeting of the Three and more recently, the Five Doctors. Most fans also know Dicks for his fifty-plus novelizations for Target Books.

Dicks lives with his family in a house located near Hampstead Heath, London. A Cambridge graduate, Dicks always wanted to be a writer. He started in the advertising world, where he spent five years. But, as he puts it, he didn't want to be remembered as the man "who wrote very good commercials for dog food." So he went to radio, a traditional British breaking ground for new writers. His first sale was a comedy thriller, which was quickly followed by several plays and a comedy series, before he moved on to television. This enabled him to become a full-time freelance writer.

Doctor Who Magazine How did you become script editor?

Terrance Dicks That came about because Derrick Sherwin, who was script editor on the series at the time, had been offered another job. He could've jet off with the job he had found his own replacement. Eventually, as a sort of second, third or even fourth choice, he came to me and said, "How long for?" and he said very cautiously, "We'll give you a three month trial contract and then we'll see. There's no guarantee you'll keep on longer than that." That three months turned into some five or six years.

At the time the programme was beginning to show some decline in the ratings. It had had some good years with William Hartnell, especially when the Daleks came. They were terribly popular. Patrick Troughton, too, was popular but towards the end of his time the figures were beginning to slip over again. There was a general feeling at the BBC that the programme had probably run its course. They were really actively looking for a replacement. I know they talked to Nigel Kneale to try to get the rights to do a Quatermass series, but Nigel didn't want to do any more Quatermass or have anybody else do any. Then they were going to do a Jules Verne sort of Victorian science fiction, and that didn't come to anything either. Eventually I think they only decided to go on with another year of Doctor Who because they hadn't come up with anything better.

Can you tell us about The War Games?

I remember correctly what happened was that more or less two script projects collapsed simultaneously. The show was in a tremendous state of chaos. So we came up with the idea of having one very long serial. We didn't really know, however, until the end, whether Patrick was going to leave at the end or not. The scripts were written at about the rate of one a day. Malcolm Hulke, who was a very fast touch typist, would sit at the typewriter and one or the other of us would say a line and it would appear on the page. In retrospect, I think that the story would benefit from losing about four episodes. The concept of the different time zones, the different wars, etc., is good. And some of the cliffhangers were good, too, like when you come out of the first world war and you see a Roman chariot coming towards you. But the plot didn't actually advance much for several episodes.

The War Games is a particularly important episode in the Doctor Who mythos, because it introduces the Time Lords. Where did that idea originate?

Well, there was no previous explanation about the Time Lords. My memory is that Derrick Sherwin said to me that the Doctor comes from this superior race of beings called the Time Lords. Where he got it from, I have no idea.

Since they seemed to work in The War Games, we developed and extended them over the Jon Pertwee years. Whenever we wanted to get the Doctor off Earth on some mission, we'd have the Time Lords use him as a kind of reluctant secret agent. That was all quite fun, the idea of having the Doctor arrive somewhere in a state of great indignation, and then get involved. Then at the end of The Three Doctors we decided we wanted to be finished with the whole concept. So the Doctor was pardoned and given back his knowledge of time travel and some vital components of the TARDIS.

Who was responsible for the idea of exiling the Doctor to earth?

That concept had, in fact, been worked out by Peter Bryant and Derrick Sherwin. It was purely a financial and not an artistic decision. It was simply cheaper to do a show with the characters set on earth because you could use contemporary clothes, vehicles, weapons, uniforms and locations. It did limit us in terms of what kind of story we could do. I remember that when it was explained to Malcolm Hulke, he was absolutely horrified. He said, "Right, you have only two stories: invasion from outer space and mad scientists."

Opposite: Terrance Dicks, Doctor Who script writer and Target book author, in his office. Below left: American and German editions of Dicks' novelisations. Above: Patrick Troughton as the Doctor, with Wendy Padbury as Zoe and Fraser Hines as Jamie, in The War Games.

How do you explain the success of the Jon Pertwee Doctor?

I think that everything clicked together. First off, Barry Letts and I got on very well and became very good friends. Then Jon took off with the public. So I think it was just the right combination of things. We were all very keen on the show and very dedicated to making it work.

The ratings figures started high and stayed high for the whole time we were on the show. I think that at the beginning, we were just living from hand to mouth. The BBC didn't make any decisions about the show until the first year was nearly over. But then, after a while, they decided it was okay to do another season, then two and three, etc. ▶

Was the decision to leave the show after five years very painful?

Not especially. There was the feeling it was coming to the end of an era. Tom had been getting increasingly restless because, although the show was a great success, he didn't want to play Doctor Who for the rest of his life. Barry and I had been doing it very successfully for the last five years, but in a sense it had grown repetitious. So the idea of leaving it kind of evolved. We didn't have anguished discussions about it. We just all kind of assumed that when Jon went, we would go. Then, a new Doctor and new people could take over.

This was about the time when you started to write the novelisations. How did that happen?

Quite fortuitously. In fact, in the early days of the show, there were three novelisations done: Doctor Who and the Daleks, Doctor Who and the Crusaders by David Whitaker, and Doctor Who and the Zarbi by Bill Strutton. These were published in hardback and really didn't make any great impression on the world. Then in the seventies, Tandem books wanted to start children's publishing house which they named Target. Their chief editor was doing the rounds and he came across these three old books. He bought them and published them in paperbacks and they sold like hotcakes.

Meanwhile, Terrance Dicks, who was then on the BBC saying he desperately needed more Doctor Who novelisations, was trying to get himself a contract and eventually got a contract. I knew he was going to be leaving the programme soon and I also always desperately wanted to write a book, seized on this opportunity and said I would do one of them. That was The Auton Invasion, then I did almost a sort of Hattie Jacques and Arthur Mullard of writers (Dr Who writers Barry Letts, Terry Nation, Malcolm Hulke, Bob Baker, Dave Martin, Terry Davis, Brian Hayles) – I've probably done more books than any other writers put together over the years. Just for a time, I had a virtual monopoly on the books.

Since the books have become so successful, more and more of the writers of the telly have started thinking that they would like to write the books themselves. I don't blame them. They have every right to do so now. I've always resisted proposals from them over the years because I don't want to do only Doctor Who books for ever.

How do you develop a novelisation?

The backbone is something called the PAB script, which stands for Programme as Broadcast. When a programme is completely finished and edited, the BBC prepares a sort of retrospective script which is taken from what is actually on the screen. What will do is get the PAB script and read it, then have a viewing of the programme or video and from which will take notes of the purely visual things. The actors may not do as described in the script, the costumes may be different, the appearance of the aliens won't be described, etc. Then I sit down with the script beside me and make my way through it, turning the story into a book.

I try to change as little as possible. Will sometimes change a line, almost a matter of instinct. Sometimes a line that's written to be spoken does not produce the same effect when it's read. Also sometimes you have to put in some notes to explain things. If it's a particularly complex story or it's a sequel to a TV story, I've written a little prologue to make things clearer. For example, I novelised Warriors of the Deep, which was a very silly all-action thing. The Silurians and the Sea Devils are back to two-dimensional monsters. So there's quite a bit in the book that wasn't on the screen at all.

Tell us about some of your most recent Doctor Who stories, such as State of Decay.

Well, I had a complicated genesis. I'd always wanted to do a vampire story on Doctor Who. One day a Box Brownie's request pile dropped one which was called The Witch Lords or a while and then The Vampire Mutations. They commissioned and I started writing it for Tom Baker and then Peter Davison came on board. There was an absolute command from on high at the BBC that we were not to do vampires on Doctor Who. At the time they were doing a serious dramatisation of Dracula with Louis Jourdan and they felt we had vampires on Doctor Who, we would be making fun of their series.

Again we were in a crisis situation and had to do something very quickly. Bob said he had always wanted to do a story on a lighthouse. So we pulled up Horror of Fang Rock very quickly. Somewhere towards the end of it, when we were really well on the way, I had the idea of having one of them be a Renaissance man who took up with Bob Holmes. So I did a little in-joke between us. Now I think Fang Rock shows the signs of some haste but it was, for me, in some ways a good one of the first and last episodes.

Early even a couple of years ago, John Nathan-Turner was looking for new stories for that last Tom Baker season. He said, "I'm told Josh's got one that included The Vampire Mutations and I was the only one he liked. So he got in touch with me and asked if I would like to do it again." Of course I was pleased to have another go at it. I then rewrote the story with Romana instead of Leela. But it was basically the same plot. I just had to write in all the stuff about how the vampires came to be in stone since at the end the Doctor was trapped there.

And what about The Five Doctors?

When the BBC contacted me I was in America at a science fiction convention in New Orleans. About 3 o'clock in the morning the phone rang and a voice at the other end said, "This is Eric." And I thought, Eric who? It was Eric Saward, the current script editor of Doctor Who, and he said, "We would like you to write the twentieth anniversary special." Of course I was very pleased. It was like one of those games where you write a story out of objects found in a box. This particular box had an awful large number of objects in it. So, you just started shuffling them around trying to find a way to put them together.

Obviously they wanted to have all the five Doctors in. They'd come up with the idea of having Richard Hurndall as a William Hartnell look-alike because I think they'd been playing around with Hartnell footage in Dimensions in Time. Various reasons were given for Peter Davison not being in it, including scheduling, but they never asked Jon who was going to be in it. So they were considerably annoyed when I wrote the story and then just when I was [illegible]

RICHARD FRANKLIN RECALLS UNIT

Feature by Richard Marson

Ask any Doctor Who fan for his fondest memories of the Jon Pertwee era of the programme and the chances are that the answer will be summed up in one word – UNIT. Go any further with the conversation and the general affection and regard for UNIT will quickly extend to the three stalwarts of that illustrious and dynamic organisation namely Brigadier Lethbridge Stewart as played by Nicholas Courtney, Captain Mike Yates, Richard Franklin, and Sergeant Benton, John Levene – maybe, then, the wonderful idea of a reunion of all three some ten years after they were last seen together in action faced with a new threat and an old enemy. The enticing prospect is a dream no longer because such a reunion has at last taken place but not as might be expected on television. Thanks to the enthusiasm of one of the original UNIT line-up, Richard Franklin, an independent stage production has been written and performed around the team.

The idea for the play came when Richard was attending a Doctor Who convention last year alongside his old co-stars. "I was so struck by the enthusiasm and interest of the fans who were there," suddenly said, during an interview that "would make a UNIT play so that everyone could see us together again on stage." Of course, a lot of people liked the suggestion but I don't think anybody really seriously thought we'd do it. But it was written and here it is. Richard is actually quite an experienced writer, his most recent work being a play entitled Shakespeare Was A Hunchback which received excellent reviews in the trade press. This, intriguing when featured Richard as Queen Elizabeth 1st.

The writing of Recall UNIT proved to be quite a difficult task. "It happened by degrees. I had a lot of help from George Cairns who acted as a sounding board for my inspirations and, because he knew the show's continuity, advised on technical details. He brought up things like the use of the Tissue Compression Eliminator and the phrase 'Reverse the polarity of the neutron flow'. I came up with the idea of starting the play with us as ourselves and gradually merging us into our fictional personae. That holds an essential truth about the crossover that existed in real life between us and our characters," included the topical elements of the plot, like the Falklands and the satire on Margaret Thatcher, as a backdrop to the Master's off-stage plans to take over the world.

The play's first draft was completed and sent out to the main cast who all agreed to take part. Then Richard had to undertake a substantial rewrite when Nicholas Courtney had to drop out because of a television offer. "The Brigadier takes part using pre-recorded voice-over and luckily found an actor called Richard Kerries to play the Brigadier's stand-in, who really adopted most of his mannerisms. Pertwee was unable to appear in the play's first run but Richard stresses both actors can be involved since scenes have been written for them.

John Levene made his first significant stage bow with the play. He told me: "I really am doing it for Richard and because I liked the script so much. Show business as a whole no longer interests me and so this is a bit of a special case. Our audiences were wonderful throughout and it's been an interesting time for me."

The audiences were highly responsive to the play and particularly to its superb and subtle humour although the actual turnout was a disappointment with some as low as ten. Richard feels part of the reason for this was that the competition was so strong with something like 840 shows running at the same time during the Edinburgh Festival Fringe.

The plot with all its twists should really remain secret but the basic line it takes is as Richard feels part of the reason for this was that the competition was so strong with something like 840 shows running at the same time during the Edinburgh Festival Fringe.

The plot with all its twists should really remain secret but the basic line it takes is as follows. A mysterious lady called Miss Bergdo has rented a theatre ostensibly to hold auditions for a show to be taken to the troops and a conference of politicians in the Falklands. With the help of her sardonic star struck manager Alistair she sees several acts that include a mime artist, a singer and three unemployed ex-TV actors (Franklin, Levene and Courtney).

As Richard Franklin takes the stage we are given an extremely funny rendition of Daddy Wouldn't Buy Me A Bow-Wow. This was a great success with the audience albeit somewhat unexpected. So was John Levene's Moon River outing and the Brigadier's unusual version of I Want To Be In Opera.

Is farce all the way before a final confrontation with the evil Dragonids and the Supreme Dalek making his concluding appearance before the curtain falls on an extraordinary two hours' entertainment.

Having mentioned how funny the play is one routine deserves special mention. Frank and Stevenderked out in hemmes hero-ing sketts and singing the Spice Sisters song from Cinderella. Originally played by female actors several people in the audience had tears rolling down their cheeks at this absurdity. The entire production was full of witty asides and Doctor Who in-jokes, every aware player in the early demonstrates through its absurdities the power of the television series and the profound effect it has had on the lives of some of its stars.

The policy with this show was to encourage young underexposed actors who would be unknown and as show as a whole cast was especially impressed with the facial expressions and vocal range of Graham Smith an Edinburgh Youth Theatre actor who played cast as Miss Bo gus's accompanie Mime artist Pa Holness was a delight to watch while Gym's Dock as the singer Sha on gave a strong but reserved. performance. Graham Rudden and David Royance both Doctor Who fans were enjoyable witty. A the way from Sweden actress Lene Lindewa won much acclaim with her glamorous hi-tronics.

Worthy of most praise was perhaps Richard Kettles for his performance as the Brigadier's replacement Major Molesworth a difficult task since he had to compete a most like Richard Hurndall in The Five Doctors with people's feelings at the absence of the original actor. He did so admirably and should Nicholas Courtney be included in the play at a later date his part would be written in alongside Richard's an important aspect of the play's ultimate success felt.

Richard had a very loyal team, who in spite of the lack of stage experience knew exactly what they were expected to do.

After the show was over the stars were more than ready to stand and sign autographs. Richard amused the crowd with stories from his Doctor Who days such as the lovely one "I was hopeless at stuntwork in the Mind of Evil I was supposed to be watching the missile being stolen from behind a hedge. The direction was for me to get up and run up to my motorbike, jump on and drive off. So on the take I did as I had been told, got on the bike and then left it flat on my face. The bike careered off on its own, totally unstoppable, before crashing into a pile of boxes and caused a lot of damage, actually.

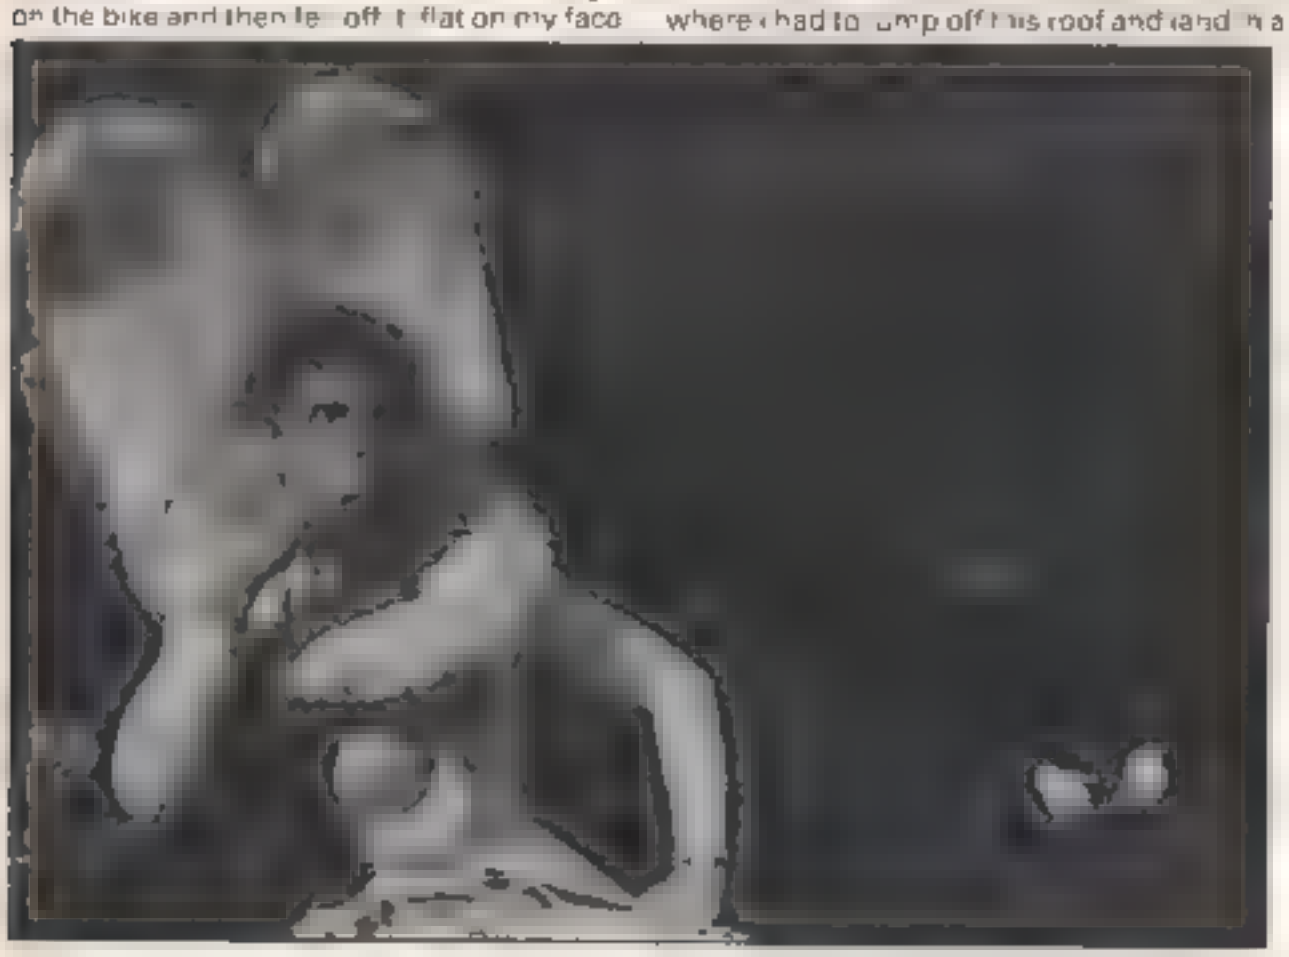
Some years later when we came to do The Green Death I had a stunt double for a scene where I had to jump off this roof and land in a road before dashing off. All I had to do was jump a few feet in the air and land in camera so that the two shots could be edited together to look as if I'd done the whole leap. Anyway, we had about 300 spectators so I thought I'd make it look really good. I jumped in the air and as I landed heard this enormous tearing sound. I'd ripped my trousers showing my underwear to all these people who, of course, fell about laughing.



Stories like these revealed the fondness felt towards Doctor Who. The play itself went down generally very well. A few purists found it too frivolous, some clearly didn't understand the Doctor Who in-jokes. But for most it was great fun.

The saga of Recall UNIT is far from over, particularly if Richard Franklin has anything to do with it. Richard is looking into the possibilities of a book version and he says he definitely wants to have a video made of the show. On top of these exciting plans Richard intends to see if ex Doctor Who actress Katy Manning might be interested in coming over from Australia to be involved if Jon Pertwee and Nicholas Courtney are available, both have expressed their wish to be included and so Richard is confident that Recall UNIT will be resurrected. ■

Thanks to all who made me so welcome at Edinburgh, especially George Cairns, Allan Stewart and Stuart Halliday. Above all thanks to the ever helpful Richard Franklin.

RICHARD FRANKLIN

Interview by Richard Marson

Doctor Who seems to have had more than its fair share of unsung heroes over the years. Certainly one of the most underrated was Richard Franklin. Best known for his role as Captain Mike Yates in the Pertwee years, Franklin was also a regular in the Hammer horror film The Satanic Rites of Dracula and starred in the Australian soap Skyways before moving to Hollywood where he starred in the Alfred Hitchcock film Road Games and the Universal TV series Cover Up.

Richard Franklin was born in Surrey and began his career as an actor in repertory theatre. He made his first television appearance in 1958 in a production of Shakespeare's Henry V and went on to appear in a number of plays and films before joining the Royal Shakespeare Company in 1962. He remained with the RSC for seven years, playing a wide variety of roles, including Mercutio in Romeo and Juliet, Ariel in The Tempest and Lucentio in The Taming of the Shrew.

Richard Franklin's first television role was in the Dennis Potter play Where the Buses Run, but he is probably best remembered for his role as Mike Yates in the Pertwee era of Doctor Who. Franklin left the series after two years to pursue a career in Hollywood, where he starred in a number of films and television series, including the Universal TV series Cover Up. He returned to the UK in the 1980s and continued to act in theatre, film and television until his death in 1997.

advertising agency responsible for the thing was supposed to be a trainee executive but at that stage he hadn't got very far. One day he decided that he'd rather be an actor but didn't really know that would be a popular decision with his boss or his parents. Together some supportive actors that he knew – Susan Hampshire and John Standing both of whom were well established and quite big names. They didn't know each other so he saw them separately saying first to Susan and then to John: 'Do you think I ought to give up everything and become an actor?' They both said quite independently and without any prompting at Shakespeare for he read them a speech from Henry V where he's walking around moaning on the eve of the Battle of Agincourt. All his men are having a nice quiet sleep but he can't rest because he's got everybody else's responsibilities and he's partly with that feeling but looking back certainly wasn't a responsible young man. By some kind of absolute fluke I got my first role and having done so resigned my job.

"Now my boss was a very white sort of bloke. He was a man of the world and a republican and he achieved through a combination of luck and coincidence. Of course he was the best person available," he laughed. "Actually my agent at the time happened to be seeing next to Barry Letts at a first night show in the West End. The opportunity came up and Barry said by way of light conversation: 'We're looking for a young man to play love interest something to get your age group the boys are really into the series and find one though.' My agent asked Barry if he had anyone in mind and was told: 'We'd like someone like Richard Franklin but don't suppose he'd do it.' Straightaway he got a phone call from the theatre and at 9.30 next morning went up to the Hill had three interviews and then was n

It almost goes without saying that, in common with Nick, Jon and John, The Daemons is probably Richard's favourite story as a whole. "I had a jolly good part in it. I was able to do very much more than usual – I was instigating action."

Pressing the point about exploring new avenues of the Captain's character, I asked Richard whether he had minded being turned into the 'traitor' figure we saw in Invasion of the Dinosaurs. This riled him slightly. "He wasn't a traitor! I don't know why everyone keeps saying that he was. He was just misguided. He'd looked into that silly old Metebelis sapphire which had made him cross-eyed as well as cross-brained. He really didn't know what he was up to. The way I rationalised it as Mike Yates was that I was helping to establish a new Golden Age on Earth – a great sort of dream that everyone looks for but which is usually suppressed. But Yates didn't realise the people he was working with were such naughty men – he was totally taken in. It was a question of his paramount idealism."

Of all the UNIT men, Yates was the one most often seen out of uniform. "I liked to be in uniform about half the time. I thought it was great to play the kind of 'mole' part in The Green Death and I had a nice suit for that. In Planet of the Spiders I was given some very comfortable clothes, including a suede jacket I was told I could have afterwards. Soon afterwards it mysteriously vanished, never to be seen again!"

The early Seventies for Doctor Who meant action – and for the actors it meant working with the stuntmen from Havoc. It wasn't all stunts, though, as Richard explained. "I did some aikido with the BBC aikido club, because although we had some outstanding stunt boys who'd do all the dangerous stuff, it was nice for them to know that the actor they were working with was at least sensitive to what they were trying to do in terms of falls, jumps, leaps and so on. There were a lot of them – if I had to catch someone or fall I could do so properly."

What about the infamous sequence in Terror of the Autons when Richard accidentally knocked Terry Walsh, playing an Auton, over the edge of a dangerously steep precipice? Did Richard still have pangs of guilt about it? "No, I don't feel any guilt at all. I wish he'd broken his neck!" he laughed, quickly adding, "Seriously, Terry was a lovely bloke, exceptionally professional. All the stunt crews had this tremendous esprit de corps. I had to do that fight scene on the village green in The Daemons myself, so I remember that very well. The best part of it all was flying in on the helicopter. It was a funny little thing that sort of pulled you from the top of your head. It was only a two-man affair.

"Also in The Daemons the script called for me to do an extended motor bike chase. Now I'm terrified of motor bikes – so we got round it in two ways. First of all Stuart Fell did all the long shots of me driving along. Then we fixed a motor bike to the top of a van and the crew filmed me as it moved along."

Another performance memory that causes Richard to wince even now concerns Terror of the Autons. "Masses of things went wrong but this was the ultimate! At the very end of the story UNIT turn up, guns blazing, and I had been given this magnificent line on seeing the enemy Autons approaching. They were those nasty faceless things and I had to say, 'We've got 'em now, sir!' in close-up. Now I've always worked very hard as an actor – sometimes a little too hard. I put everything I've got into this one shot and I thought I'd done it rather well.

"A fortnight later we came to the studio and they had to put in the telecine stuff. We all stopped for a moment to see this brilliant climax and then suddenly there was this great big face all over the screen yelling out 'We've got 'em now, sir!' It was so over the top it wasn't true. The whole studio absolutely fell about – the roar was so loud I thought the studio was going to fall down.

"Barry Letts was awfully nice about it – he came quietly up to me and said, 'It was a little bit OTT, wasn't it? Would you like to re-record it?' That was very nice of him because it was all time and money – we couldn't re-shoot so we did the next best thing and I re-dubbed it."

Recording on location brought out more than its fair share of problems. "It's nice if it's hot weather but we usually did it when the weather was foul. Now, the Doctor Who team go everywhere – Lanzarote and so on – whereas we went to Dungeness in January and ghastly places like that. I didn't enjoy filming Claws of Axos one little bit because of that, though I loved the story. Poor Katy nearly died of cold in her mini skirt. We were all wearing pink long-johns under our uniforms but we still turned a very funny colour. They had to put on specially dark make-up to cover up! Also, because our muscles got frozen up we overran and several scenes had to be rewritten from being on location to going into the studio.

"On the other hand, The Daemons filming was lovely. We had the longest time on location for that. In the first week we all got suntans. We were doing that only a matter of weeks before transmission."

The tight schedule brought particular headaches for all those working on the show. "We were allowed two takes and if you went over that people began to get worried. I remember in the studio for The Mind of Evil Jon having six or seven retakes for technical reasons – and boy, was there a panic on!"

Richard always watched his own performance. "I did so quite religiously. I didn't always hate myself – there were things that did come off. I hated it if I had done something wrong – but mercifully most of it came over very well."

What about the directors Richard worked with? Had they influenced his decision to direct – and had he ever wanted to direct for television? "The thing about television is that you didn't get the same degree of attention that you do in the theatre. Chris Barry was wonderful, but as a rule television directors are much more concerned with cameras and monsters and special effects. They tried to be helpful but you had to know what you were doing. We did get a lot of support from Barry who had himself been an actor as well as a director and producer. I think it's useful if a director has been an actor. There is an idea which persists that directors are terribly intellectual and that actors are too ignorant to direct. This isn't so. There are actors who can bring all aspects of a production together – I hope I'm one.

"I would like to direct for television. When I was doing Doctor Who I did try, and Barry Letts introduced me to some people, but it was just at the time of the first lot of cuts. I would have had to wait four years which seemed rather a long time. People were simply not taking on any more trainee directors."

Richard Franklin does not care for the restricted entry system of Equity – the actors' union to which you have to belong to be an actor. Employment without an Equity card is rare and a card cannot be obtained without professional experience – thus a vicious circle ensues. "It's absolutely wrong. If I, as a director, want to cast somebody because I think they'd be right for the part then I would like to be free to do so. If I make a mistake, it's my responsibility and I'll pay for it. Casting is a high-risk business, but if it wasn't acting as a whole would be very boring. Just because someone's in Equity doesn't mean they're any good. An actress friend of mine called Julie Legrand who's now working at the National took two years to get her card, which is ridiculous. She should have got it straightaway. Similarly there are actors who, on the basis of their work, should have their cards taken away!"

How did Richard feel Doctor Who had affected his career? "I don't honestly know. I don't think I've had the offers from television I would like to have had. Maybe I didn't play the part well enough, maybe it didn't show me off well enough, or maybe the BBC decided I was incapable of playing another part – who knows? There isn't a lot of work going round, of course, and lately I've been exceedingly busy doing other things."

Of prime interest to Doctor Who fans is the news that Richard has written a play, Recall UNIT – the Great T-Bag Mystery (see page 26 for exclusive coverage). During the rest of the year, Richard has directed productions of the hit play No Sex Please – We're British!, and Willy Russell's One For The Road; he is to direct Move Over, Mrs Markham in Oslo, a film for Yugo Tours and appear at a Chicago Doctor Who convention.

Finally I asked Richard to sum up the experience of Doctor Who. What had it given him that he valued most? His answer was simple. "Companionship."
